These objections are altogether more fauci-ful than substantial. In the first place, every nation has of necessity the inherent right to nation has of necessity the innerest and rest-regulate and control the migration to and rest-dence of people of foreign countries within its limits. This power is exercised by every government, and cannot be justly questioned. To argue otherwise would be to contend that a government may barter or cede away its own power to regulate and govern its own do policy. The right to abrogate a treaty is also unquestionable; when the abrogation interont three or four have declared him to be the choice of their Republican neighbors. During absolute. the Chinese treaty none is required.

The objection to the bill because our trade with China is alleged to be increasing, especially in exports of American cotton goods. and that this unfriendly action may have the effect of giving that trade back to England, is really of no practical force. Until within a few years we have bought largely of tea and low years we have bought largely of tea and silk from China, and have paid for them main-ly in silver. The trade was in the interest of China, Our purchases from China for the year ending June 30, 1877, amounted to $11,141,447, against which we experted only $1,646,000 in merchaudise, and for the balance paid in direct experts of silver or in gold bills on London. Since then we have increased our exports of cotton manufactures to China, just as we have increased such exports to other conn-

The allegation that this discrimination against Chinese immigration is a denial of "national hospitality and asylum." which has always marked our history, is not well founded. When the treaty with the Chinese was negotiated the Mongolian as a part of our population was unknown. American welcome and hospitality to persons of other nations are founded on the expected absorption and assim-ilation of all immigrants with our people; dation of all images part of our people, and that they will become part of our people, and their alien character be lost in their identifi-cation with the American people.
